In our report last month, we reviewed the degree to which the US Federal Reserve was too restrictive in its monetary policy. It should have come as no surprise that the Fed cut by 50 bp at its September meeting and will probably cut by another 25 bp in November before entering a holding period. Whether these cuts will be enough to stave off a recession in 2025 has evoked a great deal of debate. The "no-recession" proponents point to the strength of the labour market, healthy consumer spending, low inflation forecasts, high real yields, and continued productivity gains from technological innovation and capital investment in the US. Conversely, the "pro-recession" camp highlights the lagged effect of monetary policy on the broader economy, some softening of the jobs market, and the decline in personal savings as potential precursors of future consumer expenditure. The latest escalation in conflict in the Middle East has the potential to unsettle volatility, strengthen the dollar, and increase oil prices. Any supply-side shock of this nature could further alter the market's current expectation of low inflation and sustained growth for the US in 2025. Our base case for the year ahead is that the US maintains a positive growth path, US inflation surprises to the upside, and interest rates don't decline as much as expected. The wild card in the mix is the extent to which China stimulated fiscally as well as monetarily. We are pleased to report an improvement in performance given the exposure to long domestic bonds, which we have lightened post-quarter end.
